STERLING

- STERLING has information about print and online resources available only within the Howard University Library system

- WorldCat maintains a collection of over 50,000 libraries including Howard University. It is considered the world's largest network of library content and services.

Keyword Searching

- Most search engines and databases automatically search keywords or words anywhere unless you specify another type of search.
- Keyword searching retrieves items that have terms that match the words you entered. Terms are matched from any part of a Web page or any field within a record, therefore, the search yields more information with less precision. The objective is to recall as much information as possible.

Source: Research 101,

<http://www.lib.uconn.edu/using/tutorials/rsearch/HTML/Search/Search06.htm>

Recall vs. Precision Searching

- Searches in specific fields such as author, title, subject or URL (Web address) will typically retrieve less information with more precision.
- When working on a large original research project or to find unique (or recent) terms, a recall or keyword search is usually effective.
- When you need a relatively small number of sources on a specific topic, precision searching is more useful.

Source: Research 101,

<http://www.lib.uconn.edu/using/tutorials/rsearch/HTML/Search/Search06.htm>

Search Strategies

- Logical or Boolean Operators are connecting words that narrow or broaden a search (AND, OR, NOT) [In most databases, when no operator is specified, “AND” is assumed.]
- Wildcards / truncation symbols are used for searching variant forms of words (e.g., child* for child, children, childhood, etc.)
- Quotation marks direct searching of exact phrases
- Nesting keeps terms within parenthesis together as a unit
